| [The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services recently put forth a report based on national health statistics collected over the past fifteen years. The data show that, on average, physicians perceive their African American patients as less intelligent than their Caucasian patients (van Ryn & Burke, 2000). Results suggest that people still believe that Black people are less intelligent than White people in the modern era. Findings from other studies suggest that these perceptions may be justified, with African Americans showing lower academic ability and intelligence about health than their Caucasian peers (Jaschik, 2012; National Center for Education Statistics, 2006)./The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services recently put forth a report based on national health statistics collected over the past fifteen years. The data show that, on average, physicians perceive their African American patients as similar in intelligence to their Caucasian patients. Results suggest that perceptions that Black people are less intelligent than White people are declining in the modern era.
